Abstract:

In 1927 Holmyard formulated the hypothesis that the Abbasid activist Ḥayyān al-‘Aṭṭār ("Ḥayyān the Perfumer", fl. 98/717) was the father of the second/eighth century alchemist Jābir b. Ḥayyān. It will be shown here that this hypothesis is contradicted by two new sources that have since been published (al-Balādhurī's Ansāb al-ashraf and the anonymous Akhhār al-‘Abbās wa-waldihī). The important implications of this finding for the question of Jābir's historicity will also be explored. Although the references to Jābir in later sources (including a number of new ones which will be listed here) strongly suggest that he is not a historical figure, his historicity is still often accepted, or at least left open as a possibility. It will be argued that Holmyard's hypothesis has been a crucial factor in this continued acceptance, and that its rejection probably also entails the rejection of a historical Jābir.
